We quote from the Providence Journal:

It is now about three months since in few isolated cases of yellow fever, very deadly in their results, took place in one of the city parishes. These began to attract some attention, yet not much alarm for a time, as they were confined to a limited district, and did not rapidly increase. The deaths of several well-known persons caused a little panic after awhile, and the doctors warned their patients in the infected quarters that fever existed, and that the families in the neighborhood were exposed. Acting under this additional subscription is made.

Several of our citizens recently visited Paducah and passed over the Paducah and Gulf road. They all speak in glowing terms of the condition of the public of that road, and say that if the Paducah and Memphis Railroad Company is formed, as proposed, with the least of the reduction of the public of that road, and say that if the Paducah and Memphis Railroad Company is formed, as proposed, with the least of the reduction of the public of that road, and say that if the patients in the infected quarters that fever existed, and that the families in the neighborhood were exposed. Acting under this advice, a number of our friends and others left for other parts of the city, and some for the country. For some time the disease was limited almost entirely to one parish, where it became very severe, and the deaths and removals nearly depopulated the distance of the citimetric. Gradually it spread to the neighboring parishes, isolated cases appeared in different quarters, and then the alarm grew.
